

Expand solidarity! Defeat exchange!

Last week's Strategy Note 311 said we must expand our solidarity relationships to replace exchange.

We must win the long competition between the exchange economy and our solidarity economy. For instance, you probably don't use exchange within close relationships like family and friends. With whom might you like to add an exchange-free relationship?

Some neighborhoods have Little Free Library boxes, free pantry boxes, and Really Really Free Markets. Some have exchange-free community gardens or tool libraries. The rapid --though still very small-- spread of these projects suggest people find them attractive. Might you like to help such an exchange-free project?

These early forms of exchange-free institutions cannot support all our economic needs. But they demonstrate possibilities. Such projects also give people experience administering and maintaining exchange-free relationships on larger scales than a household. Projects like these help us learn how to expand our solidarity economy.

The time has come to accelerate such growth and accelerate widespread understanding of the shift from exchange to solidarity.

Transitions like this grow slowly over a long time and then -- sooner than most people expect-- the balance shifts and the transition dramatically accelerates.

Expand solidarity! Defeat exchange!

Last week's Strategy Note 311 said we must expand our solidarity relationships to replace exchange.

We must win the long competition between the exchange economy and our solidarity economy. For instance, you probably don't use exchange within close relationships like family and friends. With whom might you like to add an exchange-free relationship?

Some neighborhoods have Little Free Library boxes, free pantry boxes, and Really Really Free Markets. Some have exchange-free community gardens or tool libraries. The rapid --though still very small-- spread of these projects suggest people find them attractive. Might you like to help such an exchange-free project?

These early forms of exchange-free institutions cannot support all our economic needs. But they demonstrate possibilities. Such projects also give people experience administering and maintaining exchange-free relationships on larger scales than a household. Projects like these help us learn how to expand our solidarity economy.

The time has come to accelerate such growth and accelerate widespread understanding of the shift from exchange to solidarity.

Transitions like this grow slowly over a long time and then -- sooner than most people expect-- the balance shifts and the transition dramatically accelerates.

